Extract of letter,

W. L. Garrison to Samuel May, Jr.

Roxbury March 10. 1867.

— — — — — "Yes, it is true that I am seriously thinking of going across the Atlantic this summer — for four reasons. First, because, tho' I expect to be sea-sick, I believe the trip would be decidedly beneficial to my health, and therefore to my future usefulness; for, though I am much better than I was last summer and fall, I am still lacking in my usual strength and spirits, and need a total change in my surroundings. My previous trips to England have always given me renewed vigor. Second, it will be something — I think a great deal — to see the Paris Exhibition of the world's industries; but this pleasure will be immeasurably, enhanced by meeting there Fanny and her husband and Frank, and perhaps ultimately, U. turning with them all. Third, as a World's Anti-Slavery Congress is to be held at Paris about the middle of June, it is fitting that I should be present; and understanding that I contemplate going to it, the Executive Committee of the American Freedmen's Commission have already requested me to appear as a delegate in its behalf. Fourth, I wish to see my old Anti-Slavery friends in England, to rejoice with them face to face over the abolition of American Slavery, and in all probability to take of them a final, ^{earthly} farewell. You know, my dear friend, for the last three years, I have had such a project in view.

First, we talked of going ^{over} together, ting but that failed. The next year George Thompson and I speculated about going across, but he could not see his way clear to do so.

Last year I was utterly broken down by my fall. This time I trust it will not prove a failure; but I shall not think of going ^{if} at the last, the health of my dear wife should seem to be precarious.

xxxxx With his characteristic self-abnegation, she desires me to go and join the children, and seek thereby the renovation of my health. I shall have an excellent person, a relative of hers, to be with her during my absence."
